An Overview of Key Issues in Geriatric Mental Health —September 18, 2009

A New Seminar offered as part of the Older Adult Mental Health Certificate Program

You and other health and human service professionals working with older adults can improve your outcomes with older adults by understanding the unique nature of late life mental disorders. Effective mental health care can greatly affect the quality of life for these people.

Current and future demographics show a growing need for mental health care for older adults. It is estimated that today around 12% of older adults suffer from a mental disorder and in the next 20 years that percentage is expected to double. Apart from cognitive disorders, the incidence of late life depression and anxiety disorders are the most frequently experienced mental health problems.

This seminar introduces you to the characteristics, screening tools and the most effective treatments for late life depression and anxiety disorders.
